"Week's Bages, left for me!"

"Through the house the words are ringing. I heard a deep, low tone. Listen, my darling, listen—"

"I'm here, my darling, I'm here!"

"The voice is soft and low, And we tend to catch the meaning. For the breath comes hard and slow."

An Ancient Nose-Pulling Affair.

Mr. Adams' private secretary was his son,

John Adams, who soon made himself very obnoxious to a large portion of the evening Mr. Russell Jarvis, who then edited the Washington Telegraph, a newspaper which advocated Jackson's election, attended a "dinnering-out" at the White House, according to his wife and a party of visiting relatives from Boston. Mr. Jarvis introduced those who were with him to Mr. Adams, who greeted them courteously, and then passed on to the East Room. Soon afterward they returned standing opposite to Mr. John Adams, who was conversing with the Rev. Mr.

Stetson. "With that lady?" asked Mr. Stetson.

"That," replied Mr. John Adams, in a tone so loud that the party heard it, "is the wife of one Russell Jarvis, and if he knew how contemptible he is viewed in this house we would not wish to have him here."

At once paid their respects to Mrs. Adams and withdrew. Mr. Jarvis having first ascertained from Mr. Stetson that it was Mr. John Adams who had insulted them. A few days after

Mr. Jarvis sent a note to Mr. John Adams, demanding an explanation, by a friend of his. Mr. Adams, who was at the time in the city, declined to make an apology to Mr.

Jarvis, and that he wished no correspondence with him.

A week later Mr. John Adams went to the capital to deliver messages from the President to each house of Congress. Having finished that duty, he addressed to the Speaker of the House of Representatives, a long and able address, in which he went through the rounds toward the Senate Chamber, where was overtaken by Mr. Jarvis, who pulled his coat and stepped into the room. He was then quickly parted by Mr. Dorse, a friend of Mr. Jarvis. Mr. Adams, President

Adams notified Congress in a special message of the occurrence, and the House appointed a select committee of investigation. Witnesses were examined and elaborate reports were drawn up, but neither the majority nor the minority recommended that any punishment be inflicted upon Mr. Jarvis. "For Jarvis's conduct," said the majority in the National Metropolis.
